DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN DEVELOPMENT & PSYCHOEDUCATIONAL STUDIES

MISSION

The Department of Human Development & Psychoeducational studies (HDPES) offers unique and competitive programs at the undergraduate, masters, and doctoral levels. The mission of HDPES is to meet the human development, educational, and psychological needs of a multicultural society. Advocacy is at the core of the HDPES programs, which equip graduates to be leaders of change, reflective practitioners, and engaged researchers. Graduates are steeped in a knowledge base that is designed to eradicate the effects of racism in education, research, and human service delivery. HDPES programs prepare educators, psychological practitioners, and researchers for leadership roles and challenging careers in schools, colleges/universities, community programs, government, and other career settings in research, service, and policy serving individuals and their families.

GRADUATE DEGREE PROGRAM OFFERINGS:

- Educational Psychology (Ph.D.)

PROGRAM OVERVIEW

The PhD in Educational Psychology emphasizes the practical application of learning and development theories to the study of human behavior. Students majoring in educational psychology pursue an empirically based interdisciplinary program of study. The primary objective of the program is to produce psychologists who are capable of performing scholarly research and evaluation studies and practitioners who are skillful in applying principles of psychology to the resolution of developmental and educational problems. In particular, graduates are expected to think critically; analyze and solve problems; make ethical decisions; apply knowledge by linking theory with practice; understand and use technology; know and understand self, history, and community; assume leadership roles in the global community; and demonstrate knowledge, sensitivity, and skill in working with special needs and diverse populations.
